PROFESSOR OF MILITARY SCIENCE*

IS INTERVIEWED BY THE NEWS LETTER ON . . .

THE ROTC PROGRAM AT MIDDLEBURY

Q. How is the curriculum of the ROTC Department currently organized?

A. The ROTC program at Middlebury is a four year academic program with a six weeks Summer Camp Training Period for members of the Advanced Course. The program is divided into two separate yet complementing courses of instruction: The Basic Course, mandatory for all Freshman and Sophomore men, and the Advanced Course, leading to a reserve commission for selected qualified Junior and Senior men.

The program at the College is specifically tailored to approach all subjects from the academic, rather than the mechanical, point of view. During the Freshman year the course is designed to foster in the student an understanding of the Army and its missions and responsibilities. This is accomplished by an analytic study of the purpose and organization of the Armed Forces which enables the student to determine tendencies in military development, concepts, and basic military principles; and culminates with a critical evaluation of selected world events in which the military has had a direct influence or role. During the second year of military instruction the student continues with the study and appraisal of the principles of war by examining military engagements and by discussing the operations and the problems encountered. By making a series of analyses throughout the course the student is better qualified to understand and interpret the development of the military forces of the world and in turn can effectively evaluate the military potential of nations.

The program during the Junior year offers the student a more detailed and comprehensive examination of subject matter than he received during the Basic Course. A vital part of this year is the independent research thesis that the student is required to submit in the second semester. The thesis is designed to give the student an opportunity to correlate and interpret a significant military subject with his major academic field. The independent study program has been thoroughly coordinated with the other departments of the College and the thesis is subjected not only to an examination by the Military Department, but also by the student's major department.

The last year of the program is devoted primarily to the preparation of the student for his future role as a leader in his home community, as a private citizen and as a commissioned officer in the Army.

Q. Is the military program flexible enough to stay abreast of the changing times?

A. In the academic approach to military instruction it is essential that certain inherent conditions be provided to insure that the program can remain flexible. To achieve this degree of flexibility there are three major areas that the Middlebury ROTC Department has emphasized. First, the College has the option in the Freshman program to substitute an academic course for the present course in Military History. Second, the Professor of Military Science has the authority to modify the present course of instruction by scope and methods of presentation as the situation warrants. An immediate example of this is the guest lecture series that the Department instituted this year. Third, the Department of the Army is constantly evaluating the ROTC program and making changes in the subject matter, not only to bring it up to date, but also to make the program compatible with current educational policies at the nation's colleges and universities.

Q. Does the Military Program at the College contribute to the traditional "Liberal Arts" concept of education as visualized at Middlebury?

A. Yes. At Middlebury the Military Department feels that the academic side of military instruction should be stressed. To aid in incorporating the "Liberal Arts" concept into the military program, the Professor of Military Science instituted a guest lecture series this year that was conducted by members of eight departments on the campus. Throughout the series each lecturer was encouraged to present, interpret, and discuss his subject purely from the academic point of view and without any influence or association with the military. The lecture series was designed to present to the student a survey of the development and growth of American foreign policy, the social structure and organization of major world powers, a geographic evaluation and comparison of the United States and the Soviet Union, and a comparative analysis of selected foreign governments with emphasis on political and economic development and trends. A special feature of the program was a series

*Lt. Col. Richard H. Maeder will replace Lt. Col. Hale H. Knight as Professor of Military Science with the start of the new college year in September.

This year's Alumni Fund reached its goal of $100,000. Nap Blanchette, '29, and Mary Henseler Cassidy, '31, were co-chairmen of the Fund. Details concerning the Alumni Fund will be contained in the Annual Alumni Fund Report to be published later this summer.

As of the close of the fiscal year on June 30th, parent giving for the past year achieved an all-time high with total gifts from parents amounting to $139,135.73. Also, gifts from "Business and Industry" achieved a record high with $78,087.49 received. This compares with the previous high of $69,304.97 for Fiscal Year 1961.

The National Science Foundation has again given Middlebury a grant to be used as a means of strengthening the College's ability to create new scientific knowledge and educate scientists and engineers essential to the national well-being. The grant received in early July was in the amount of $5,100.

The College has received a gift of $20,000 from Miss Helen A. Franklin of Woodsville, N.H., for the purpose of establishing the E. Chester "Ben" Franklin Scholarship Fund in the permanent endowment of Middlebury College. Preference is to be given to the descendants of Ben Franklin, '21.

Members of the College's buildings and grounds staff are to be complimented on the several hundreds of dollars they saved Middlebury in the recently completed Egbert Starr Library Project. In addition to many miscellaneous jobs, carpenters built several mahogany bookcases and tables. The mahogany was furnished "at cost" by the Hancock (Vt.) Plywood Co.

The Class of 1966 entering the College in the fall will consist of 350 men and women. These new students were selected from the 1226 women and 1100 men who applied for admission.

With a substantial loss of material and a number of first team vacancies to be filled, the 1962 Middlebury football squad's prospects do not appear as bright as in recent years. Coach Duke Nelson has labeled 1962 as a "rebuilding year." In September, the coaching staff will have only eleven lettermen available. Duke will have the problem of developing a quarterback, depth at fullback, and filling six positions on the starting eleven.

Construction has started this summer at the Middlebury College Snow Bowl on the completion of the ski lodge which when completed in the fall will be named the "Neil Starr Ski Lodge." It is expected that this lodge will take care of the Bowl's needs for many years to come. (See Winter 1962 NEWS LETTER- "Where the College Champions Ski.")

Three honor members of the Class of 1962 have received scholarship grants totaling $5430 for graduate study at Columbia University. Recipients of the grants are Michael L. Black, Julie M. Geehr, and Michael D. Riess. Indications point to a large percentage of this year's graduating class doing graduate work in the fall.

Members of the Middlebury College family were saddened by the sudden death of Edward L. Bond, Jr., a few weeks after graduation (see page 48)

News of the COLLEGE

More than a thousand persons watched or took part in the Commencement program ending the College's 162nd academic year on June 11th. President Samuel S. Stratton presided as Middlebury awarded 245 Bachelor of Arts Degrees, six Master's Degrees, and five Honorary Degrees.

Harland Cleveland, Assistant Secretary of State, was the speaker at Commencement. He urged the members of graduating class to keep in mind that the "public interest is a way of thinking" (See Page 12).

The 1962 recipients of honorary degrees included, left to right, (seated) John J. McCloy, Disarmament Coordinator; (President Stratton) Laura Cabot Hodginson, chairman of the Board of Trustees of Smith College; (standing) Thomas H. Carroll, president of George Washington University; Wilhelm Grewe, German ambassador to the U. S.; and, Harland Cleveland, Assistant Secretary of State.

Recipients of Honorary Degrees Were:

Harland Cleveland, Assistant U. S. Secretary of State—Doctor of Laws

". . . We honor you today because with outstanding ability and with the objectivity a liberal education strives to provide, you have directed your scholarly and administrative talents to the service of education and government. As a one-time editor and publisher of a magazine of wide repute, as author of pioneering studies in the role of the United States overseas, and now as Assistant Secretary of State, deeply involved in the crucial problems of our international relations, we invite you to join our honorary fellowship with full knowledge of the burdens you have accepted, and full recognition of the integrity and competence you bring to the responsibilities you have gladly undertaken."

Thomas H. Carroll, President of George Washington University—Doctor of Laws

". . . As a one-time professor, dean, foundation executive, and now president of a great university, we honor you for your achievements but in part also because you have always had a sympathetic and intuitive respect for scholarship and knowledge of the ways to encourage scholars in their unending pursuit of truth."

Wilheim C. Grewe, German Ambassador to the United States—Doctor of Laws

"For over fifty years Middlebury has demonstrated its interest in the culture, language, and the literature of the German people, first by establishing a graduate school of German studies on this campus, and, more recently, by the inauguration of the Middlebury Graduate School of German at the University of Mainz . . . It is fitting for us to give recognition to the friendly and generous co-operation which you and your colleagues display toward continuing efforts to strengthen the educational and cultural relations between our countries. More personally we honor you as the scholar, legal expert, and diplomat, who with outstanding distinction has contributed to the present friendly and mutually satisfactory relationship between our great countries."

Laura Cabot Hodginson, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Smith College—Doctor of Humanities

". . . We honor you today as an accomplished Vermonter who graciously, unselfishly, and with a high degree of competence has exceeded the call of civic duty of even a liberally educated woman. Your willingness to serve your college, your community, your church, and to do so in posts which demand exacting and untiring leadership qualify you for such honors we now can bestow."

John J. McCloy, one-time high commissioner to Germany and now Disarmament Advisor for President Kennedy—Doctor of Laws

"You have willingly accepted many calls to public service, yet you have also found time to become deeply committed to the ideals and objectives of higher education, and you have contributed greatly to the advancement of our liberal arts colleges . . . We are also deeply cognizant that you have been chosen by the President of the United States to attempt to achieve with justice a disarmament program that could lead to amicable relations throughout the world."

of lectures on the Soviet Union, which covered the political, social, economic, and cultural evolution from 1917 to the present. Other examples of the academic approach to instruction are the required written papers and the independent study program.

Q. What benefits does the ROTC Program offer to students?

A. It is quite apropos that Military Science be included in a Liberal Arts curriculum along with the natural sciences, languages, and humanities. The science of arms employment in either a "cold or hot war" cannot be divorced from our present way of life. Many have stated that the best way of insuring our way of life is to educate our youth not only in democracy and how it operates, but also in other governmental systems. If, for no other reason than exposing the student to these facts, the ROTC program benefits the student. There are, however, certain other benefits that should be considered.

First, the ROTC Program offers each qualified male student the opportunity to become a commissioned officer and serve his military obligation in the highest capacity possible. Second, the Advanced Course Student is provided with a financial benefit in the form of a monthly subsistence allowance. Third, the ROTC Program opens to the student a variety of interests and broader viewpoint on issues he normally would not be exposed to. Fourth, the ROTC Program allows the student to complete his college education before he is required to serve his military obligation.

Q. Why should the first two years of the Military Program be required by all male students?

A. In making the Basic Course a requirement for all men it is believed that sufficient introduction will be made to acquaint the student with the United States Army and the goals of the Military Program. This introduction allows the student to make a systematic evaluation of the program and then to make an intelligent judgment as to whether or not he desires to apply for the Advanced Course. Experience has indicated that approximately 50% of all applicants would not have applied if the first two years had not been mandatory.

Q. Do our better students enroll in the Advanced Course and continue for an officer's commission?

A. Yes. At Middlebury a selection board determines who will be enrolled in the Advanced Course Program. A comprehensive study is conducted by the board to determine each student's ability and potential. Only those students who meet the standards set by the board are accepted into the program. From the Class of 1955 through the Class of 1962, a total of 553 students made application for the Advanced Course and 371 men were selected. Of this number 348 received reserve commissions with 24 honor students in the Program accepting regular Army commissions.

Q. What is the academic record of the Military Department? How do the standards of this Department compare with the other departments of the College?

A. In our opinion the academic standards of the Military Department compare favorably with the other departments of the College. Recently the Department conducted a comprehensive evaluation of its administrative and grading procedures to insure compliance with college regulations. Changes were instituted in some areas and results have been gratifying. Recent records published by the College indicate that the Military Department grade distribution is comparable to that of all other departments.

Q. What obligations does the College have in maintaining the ROTC Program?

A. There are certain obligations that the College agreed to when the Program was established. Listed among these obligations are: (1) To provide adequate office, classroom and storage rooms for the Unit. (2) To maintain a Basic Course at the College which would be required of all Freshman and Sophomore men. (3) To maintain an Advanced Course which would extend through the remainder of the normal period of the undergraduate study. (4) To require each student enrolled in any military course to complete that course as a prerequisite for his graduation from the College. (5) To adopt into the curriculum courses or subjects prescribed by the Secretary of the Army. (6) To grant academic credit applicable toward the graduation requirement for each successfully completed semester.

Q. Why does the Army maintain an ROTC Program at the College?

A. In recent years the United States Government has found it necessary to present to the world a strong defensive posture. It is apparent that the situation that exists today, which causes this need, will continue to exist for many years. This means that the Army will be larger and stronger than any peacetime Army has been in the history of our nation. The current national requirement for new officers is approximately 16,000 annually. The largest single source of officers is the ROTC Program. At present 247 colleges and universities throughout the nation are supplying the major portion of this number. Middlebury College, realizing the need for her young men to participate in the defense of their nation, and the need for them to compete effectively with their contemporaries from other institutions, continues to strongly support the ROTC Program.

Board of Trustees Changes Announced

THREE term members of the Middlebury College Board of Trustees have been elected to life memberships, and one new term trustee named to the Board.

William S. Youngman, an international insurance executive, was elected a term trustee. A magna cum laude graduate of both Harvard College and the Harvard Law School, he is president of C. V. Starr & Company and is chairman of the board of several other national and international insurance companies. He is also president of the Starr Foundation and an officer in The Mount Mansfield Co. of Stowe, Vt.

William S. Youngman

Mr. Youngman was admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1934, and to the bar of the U. S. Supreme Court in 1939. He has also been admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia and New York state. Mr. Youngman was counsel to the National Power Policy Committee in Washington and later served as chief counsel to the Federal Power Commission.

Elected life trustees of the College were Alice Guest Howson, '30 (see plaque citation on page 8), L. Douglas Meredith, and Robert D. Proctor. Mr. Meredith is executive vice president and chairman of the committee on finance of the National Life Insurance Co., while Mr. Proctor is first vice president and treasurer of the Vermont Marble Co.

Trustee Emeritus Elbert S. Brigham Dies

AS THE NEWS LETTER was going to press on July 6th word was received of the death of Elbert S. Brigham, '03, the College's first Trustee Emeritus. He served as a Middlebury trustee for 38 years. In his nearly four decades as a trustee, he was known among his fellow trustees for his quiet modesty, courteousness, and careful and unbiased consideration of a problem.

An outstanding member of the Class of 1903, Mr. Brigham became a successful dairy farmer in St. Albans, Vt., shortly after leaving Middlebury and later made an outstanding record as Vermont's Commissioner of Agriculture, member of the U.S. Congress for three terms, banker, and president of the nation's largest insurance firm—National Life of Montpelier, Vt.

In expressing Middlebury's loss in Mr. Brigham's death, President Stratton said: "Elbert Brigham's long service to his college as an alumnus and trustee was a record in which Middlebury takes pride. The College will miss greatly his generous interest and wise counsel."

College Names Another Vice President

THE election of Walter E. Brooker, '37, Director of Development as a vice president of Middlebury College was announced recently by President Samuel S. Stratton.

In making the announcement, Dr. Stratton praised the accomplishments of Mr. Brooker's role in the College's Development Program. He said: "The success of our recently completed $1,350,000 library expansion program has been due greatly to the many months of hard work on the part of Mr. Brooker. Middlebury is indeed fortunate to have such capable leadership in its Development Program."

Mr. Brooker was associated with the Curtis Publishing Company and the Liberty Mutual Insurance Company before coming to Middlebury in 1956 as executive assistant to the president with primary responsibility for the College's Development Program.

He has been active in alumni affairs and served as national chairman for the Middlebury Alumni Fund for three years prior to returning to the campus. He is married to the former Barbara-Ann Carrick, '40, and they have twin sons.

Alumni Fund Wins Two Honors

Middlebury College won double honors in the 1962 Alumni Giving Incentive Awards Program competition at the national conference of the American Alumni Council. Dr. W. Homer Turner, Executive Director of the United States Steel Foundation, presents Middlebury College trophy to Gordon C. Perine, '49, Director of Alumni Relations.

THE Alumni Fund Program of Middlebury College was singled out for special recognition and $3,000 cash awards by the American Alumni Council. The College won double honors in the 1962 Alumni Giving Incentive Awards Programs competition with a tie for first place for improved performance among large coeducational institutions, and a second place tie in the Grand Awards improvement classification. This latter category included all of the colleges, universities and schools entered in the nine different classifications of the competition. The awards were announced at the national conference of the American Alumni Council in Banff June 26.

The judges were impressed with the overall level of giving by Middlebury alumni, the number of alumni contributors, and the continued endeavor of the College to strengthen all forms of alumni support. This is the second straight year that the annual giving of the College has received recognition in this competition. In 1961 Middlebury was awarded honorable mention for its distinguished achievement in overall development of alumni support.

The Alumni Giving Incentive Award Program was launched in 1959 by the American Alumni Council with supporting grants from the United States Steel Foundation.

The 1962 varsity football and soccer schedules:

THE ALUMNAE ASSOCIATION observed its 50th Anniversary on Saturday morning of Commencement Weekend with the official presentation of a faculty study to the College. The study was built as part of Middlebury's new Egbert Starr Library facilities. Alumnae groups contributed funds for both the room and its furnishings.

In the afternoon the Memorial Field House accommodated a large number of Alumni-ae, parents and friends for the Annual Alumni Lunch.

The results of the election of alumni-ae officers conducted through the mail last spring were announced. Robert T. Stafford, '35, was elected Alumni-Trustee-at-Large; George R. Hinman, '28, is the new National President; Randall W. Hoffman, '37, President of the Metropolitan New York District; President of the New Jersey and Pennsylvania District is William S. Weier, '33; and Robert G. Boucher, '49, is the newly elected President of the Western States District.

The Alumnae elected Miss Marion G. Cruikshank, '30, as President of the National Alumnae Association. Mrs. Roberta Rey Bond, '52, was elected delegate-at-large.

Winner of the McCullough Reunion Cup—presented each year to the class with the largest number of living members present—was the Class of 1912. Members of this 50th Anniversary Class were also presented with 50-year pin awards (see photo on page 34).

Miss Marilyn R. Bruhn, '47, retiring National President of the Alumnae Association, presents to Walter E. Brooker, '37—representative of President Stratton and a newly elected Vice President of the College—a bronze plaque for the door of the Faculty Study which the Association gave as a gift to the College. Looking on is Miss Marian G. Cruikshank,'30, newly elected National President.

BRONZE plaques for meritorious service to the College were awarded at the Alumni Lunch to the following Alumni-ae:

Alice Guest Howson, '30—"Distinction came early to you by way of a Dutton Fellowship which enabled you to study at King's College, University of London, for the year following your graduation from Middlebury. For the next eleven years you taught English at high schools in New Hampshire and New Jersey, continuing your graduate study at the Bread Loaf School of English and earning a Master's degree. You carried on your academic studies at the University of California and at Columbia University as an Ellis Fellow, teaching intermittent years at Vanderbilt University and Brooklyn College. In 1946 you began your association with Vassar College, first as a teacher of English and American literature, and then as a faculty wife. In your role as wife, mother, and grandmother, you have found time and energy to pursue interests which range from the poetry of Melville to the local program of the Board of Directors of the League of Women Voters in New York State. In addition you are currently affiliated at Vassar with the Department of the Dean as The Study Counselor. It was fitting that in 1948 you should have been one of the first two women to be elected a Trustee of Middlebury College and we are proud that you were appointed a Life Trustee this year."

Mary O. Pollard, '96—"Sixty-six years ago you graduated from Middlebury, a Phi Beta Kappa member of the Class of 1896. In 1900 you received a Master's degree from Middlebury. After graduation, you taught for several years in the Middlebury High School and then at the Pi Beta Phi Settlement School in Gatlinburg, Tenn. For the next 20 years you taught at the Frances Shimer School in Mount Carroll, Ill. Upon your retirement in 1935 you settled in Middlebury becoming a newspaper correspondent and columnist. These years in Middlebury have deepened your interest and loyalty to the College. You have contributed much to the records of Middlebury and Addison County, and you have become the unofficial historian of college, town and county."

Miss Pollard admires her plaque as Marilyn Bruhn, '47, and Alumnae Secretary Constance Sherman look on.

Mary O. Pollard died at the age of 88 after a short illness on July 9th in Middlebury.

Justin M. Ricker, '06—". . . Upon graduation you entered the teaching profession and spent 49 years in this field, teaching in Poultney, Vt., and Stamford, Greenwich and Bridgeport, Conn. . . . As head of the Warren G. Harding High School Science Dept. and Director of Athletics, you were recognized as one of the best athletic directors in Connecticut. You were personally responsible for the development of Hedges Memorial Field, making Harding the only high school in Bridgeport with its own athletic field. As an educator who loved and believed in his Alma Mater, you have sent able young men and women to Middlebury. Your interest in your College did not stop there, as you have always been most generous in your support of the Alumni Fund. Six years ago you established the Justin M. Ricker Gift commemorating your 50th Reunion, with the income to be credited to the Class of 1906. Since then you have also established both a loan fund and scholarship fund as permanent endowments at your Alma Mater."

President Stratton to retire in September of 1963

In college administration I have always noted that weeks and months pass very rapidly. As we move toward a June Commencement, we are already planning Freshman Fall Convocation. To me it never seems that four years have elapsed between my remarks to the freshmen and my words to the same young men and women on their Commencement Day. Now as I write, I realize that not only do weeks and months speed by but that years have a tendency to do the same. In short, by June 1963 I shall have completed over twenty years of service as President of Middlebury College, and I shall have reached and passed a bit the normal age for retirement. Therefore I have asked our Trustees to permit me to become President Emeritus at the end of the Summer Session of 1963. Official announcement of my retirement will probably be made not later than early August, but I do wish the readers of this Page to have the information before it comes to you from public sources.

It is not my intention now to write a valedictory, for the coming academic year will be as active and busy as all the previous ones. In retrospect I feel that one of the most lasting rewards of my office has been the satisfaction that comes from observing the development of young people from freshmen to the mature, friendly, successful graduates whom I meet at alumni dinners and Homecomings, and, on occasion, in far-away cities around the world. I have frequently commented that although I am naturally proud of the physical development of our campus, of our enhanced academic prestige, and the increase in our financial resources, I am most deeply impressed with the character and loyalty of our ever-growing Middlebury family.

The status of a college such as Middlebury can never be attributed, for better or for worse, to one man. The total environment at Middlebury is what matters most, and this environment is determined in the first instance by the quality of students selected and the competence and dedication of our faculty and staff. To the best of his ability, therefore, your President has been concerned primarily with students and faculty and staff. Successful fund raising and economical management of our resources can never be neglected, however, as every board of trustees and every executive officer knows so well. With full knowledge that the environment we seek needs constantly increasing resources and careful management of these resources, I have never regretted the time and energy these aspects of college administration have exacted. Over the years it has not always been possible to make popular decisions. I can remember the furor over a decision to paint the main entrance doors of our dormitories blue! Yet to avoid decisions, mostly much more important ones, is to retrogress, and one can only pray that most decisions have turned out for the good of the College in the long run.

In this backward glance I wish to mention your Trustees. They receive very little publicity and are usually relatively unknown to students. Their function, however, is of extreme importance to the welfare of the College. In the final analysis, it is the Trustees on whom responsibility for the state of the College, its service to young people and society, rests. It is to the Trustees that we look for the guidance and authority that would preserve and improve our environment for learning and for character development. It is the quality of this environment which creates the hallmark of a fine liberal arts college. Middlebury is and has been fortunate, I believe, in attracting to its Board of Trustees men and women who by their devotion and work give evidence of their deep concern for the continuing welfare of the College.

As for your President, I can only say that from the date of his appointment in December 1942 to the present, he has counted it an extremely high honor to serve to the best of his ability this College of which he will ever be proud. Most of all he is grateful for the friendly associations over the years—faculty, staff, trustees, students, and alumni. It is for the future, however, that all of us at Middlebury must be concerned. Our plans for the future are now a blueprint, and I enter my last year of service confident that our College is on the threshold of new and splendid achievements.

Samuel S. Stratton

A College Faces Its Alumni . . .

In his keynote address at the Commencement panel discussion—A College Faces its Alumni—Dr. Donald A. Campbell, Director of Teacher Training and a member of the History Department, pointed out that there is, currently, no lack of material about projected changes for the liberal arts college. He noted that a reading of the Spring Issue of The News Letter shows an abundant source of educated guesses about a college of 1970's perspective, curriculum, students, and financial needs. He said, "all of these ideas are well-founded and supported by experience and knowledge."

"But," he continued, "my proposition deals with a variety within the familiar species of educational changes. This single variety is commonly overlooked, yet I believe it central to any consideration of future developments of the liberal arts college. For it concerns directly a chief ingredient of any college—the student. Not that modifications of the curriculum or the physical plant do not affect the student. What my question asks is not a matter of effect but one of concern. In which of the changes we have heard proposed has the student been consulted? In which will he have a personal stake? or will he be the recipient of the gratuitous wisdom of his elders and given a collection of 'new developments' he can take away as part of his collegiate legacy?

"This question as to the concerns of the student should be asked for several reasons. First, it is he who has preconceptions about the college which need fulfillment. Then, current analysis of undergraduate attitudes and values suggest that the student, himself, is changing. Philip E. Jacob, an educational sociologist, found in 1960 that the student's outlook poses a question for American liberal education. The objectives of a liberal education—'the pursuit of truth, the cultivation of civic responsibility, and the unfolding of the good life—are not shared by the mass of today's students. To them, the primary purpose of education is utilitarian, and the use toward which it should be directed is the acquisition of vocational tooling, skill in handling human relations, and other techniques which enable a person to do well for himself in this kind of ultra-organized society.' Finally, it is the student who will be shaped by any changes, particularly in becoming a future alumnus. The loyal and effective supporters of a college are, as we know too well, a small minority of its graduates. If, by soliciting ideas for change from today's student he will be made more responsive to the complexities of higher education and its social significance, then a student experience leading to increased alumni interest is of obvious benefit.

"What I am suggesting by the way of the student playing a dynamic role in institutional improvement is not the same as advocating a student-centered institution. This would be a heresy equivalent to propounding a liberal arts program in which the student studied Latin, several sciences as well as mathematics, a broad-based fine arts sequence, and so on."

Dr. Campbell concluded his keynote address by emphasizing two of the student's ways toward vitalizing undergraduate life. He said: "academically, a case can be made for deliberate updating of material in courses to include more emphasis on clearly recognizable nagging concerns which the student must grapple with in his lifetime. Current events in history of political science might be stressed. Or, better so far as today's student is concerned, inter-disciplinary or area studies dealing with the emerging nations of the crisis of the West could be undertaken with cooperative teaching. The student has a sharp, if incomplete, picture of his real enough world, and it is logical to see one function of his education as an aid to forming answers to contemporary problems.

"Socially there is perennially student agitation for the honor system and a doing away with outmoded restrictions. One response to this demand might well be the giving over of independence in social conduct to the student to parallel the trend toward independence in study.

"Incorporation of the student's ideas by the liberal arts college would mean his concerns would become directive, not responsive, and so prepare him better for the privileges and obligations of an alumnus."

Dean Reynolds, who is also Chairman of the Department of History, undertook to defend a liberal arts education against the advocates of vocationalism.

He pointed out that the history of American institutions of higher learning indicates that they have often been judged by their usefulness in this country, but that the yardstick of usefulness has not always been that by which our best educational institutions have been measured. As various colleges and universities matured throughout the nation, there came a differentiation between those institutions which were merely useful, and those which were emphasizing higher learning in all its complicated branches. As this developed, the institutions working in the freer area of higher learning soon distinguished themselves and raised themselves to recognizably higher standards than their sister universities. Thus there developed a marked differentiation in American education between those institutions of higher learning, which were vocational primarily, and those which were liberal arts in spirit. With some notable exceptions, in the form of particularly good technology institutions which developed in certain areas of the country, he noted that the cream of our student population and faculty had tended to gravitate towards the liberal arts curriculum rather than towards the vocational institutions.

Asking the question "where does Middlebury College fit into this picture," Dean Reynolds urged that its role in the future must lie in the direction of development towards the superior education of the uncommon individual in this country. He pointed out that this was well within the Middlebury tradition for, while in the early days of the nineteenth century, Middlebury and other colleges were founded to assist young men in receiving the benefits of higher education without having to travel long distances, in fact, these colleges never did cater to everybody. It was usually the rare and talented student who would afford the time and effort to put himself through the rigorous classical curriculum of the early and middle nineteenth century. Now that Middlebury has become an institution of national repute, drawing students from all over the country, its role still must be to provide an unusual education for talented and creative young men and women.

If we are aiming towards the superior education of the uncommon individual, what then should be our task in the area of vocationalism versus liberal arts education? Dean Reynolds urged that a real education is a constant quest for the unknown. Vocational education is essentially the production of useful knowledge—things known. There is nothing wrong with useful knowledge. It is, in a very real sense, useful. But useful knowledge, by its very nature, is often dogmatic. It can petrify those who teach it and those who learn it. One learns how to do things. One does not usually trouble to ask "how is it that one learns to do this." One does not necessarily ask "is there a better way of learning this" or "is there a better way to do this." Knowledge in this useful sense sometimes becomes stultifying and petrifying.

Quoting the historian Arnold Toynbee, Dean Reynolds pointed out that in any society there are always leaders and followers. Toynbee calls them "The creative minority" and "The uncreative majority." Dean Reynolds advanced the idea that one of the benefits of the democratic society, such as that in which we live, is that it constantly brings about the possibility of new creative minorities. Our creative minority is not based on race and it is not necessarily based on permanent class (Please turn to page 48)

Seven Old Deans

By S. J. House, '41

In God Bless our Queer Old Dean W. Storrs Lee, '28, makes the following observation:

"Collectively, deans of students carry an influence that affects the destiny of a nation perhaps more than any other administrative profession, for the talent that is to solve America's problems of tomorrow comes from the column of patrons that file in and out of their offices for counsel and stimulation.

"But despite all the responsibility he carries, the Dean is still the most misunderstood character in the academic procession. To the public he is the campus spoilsport, the man who orders the tackle out of action just before the big home game, the temperance agitator who has an overwhelming aversion to bourbon and beer, the stuffy upholder of standards who ranks English history ahead of hockey, geology ahead of jazz, philosophy ahead of fraternity initiations, the symbol of authority against whom university riots are waged."

Currently, there are seven Middlebury alumns now holding the position of Dean of Students, and two alumns who are Assistant Dean of Students, all who fall into the category of "misunderstood characters." They have accepted, without trepidation, the awesome responsibility outlined by ex-Dean Lee—they acknowledge that as administrators their decisions are often not universally appreciated but quite frankly recognize the importance of their office to the college and/or university. Furthermore, as Jovian observers of the passing student throng, each will strongly assert that he is not a baby sitter to non-academic oriented irresponsible college age adolescents (in loco parentis) but rather is a dedicated educator.

A review of the colleges and universities with which the "Midd deans" are associated indicates that some of the "old Midd spirit" must be rubbing off onto approximately 76,000 college students per year. Jim McLeod, '26, Dean of Students at Northwestern University, the sixth largest university in the U.S., is responsible for 7,000 students; Bill Craig, '37, Dean of Men at Stanford University, to 9,400; Harvey Martin, '50, Dean of Students at the University of Denver, to 6,000; Randy Hoffman, '37, Dean of Students at Hofstra College, Hempstead, New York, to 3,500; Milt Pike, '45, Dean of Men at Northern Illinois, to 5,000; Charles W. Wright, '30, Dean of Students at Castleton Teachers College, Vermont, to 400 students; and S. J. House, '41, Dean of Students at NCE, to 6,000. Robert S. Martin, '50, is Associate Dean of Students at San Jose State College in California, a college of 15,000 students; and John M. Hale, '48, is Assistant Dean of Men at the University of Michigan, a college of 24,000 students. Collectively, they represent three large private universities, three state universities, one private urban institution, one state liberal arts college, and one state engineering college.

Public Interest Is A Way of Thinking

By Harland Cleveland

Following is an extract from the Commencement address delivered June 11, 1962.

No responsible person, "private or public," can ignore the public responsibility he personally carries as an integral part of his function as a maker of decisions that affect other people. He may be in or out of government, in business or in church, in foundation or association, but he is marked as a public executive if he can be said to have a responsibility to the public interest. And what responsible executive does not?

The public interest is, of course, by no means the executive's only touchstone of action and judgment; in the rarified executive atmosphere of extreme moral complexity, it competes with organizational loyalty and family ties and "professional ethics" and personal ambition and personal health and an assortment of external expectations and internalized criteria, all interacting with a speed and subtlety which no imaginable computer could duplicate.

Is it possible to define the "public interest," to isolate it from the other considerations, at least for purposes of analysis? My answer would be that it can ultimately be defined:

For each person by that person,
For each situation in that situation.

In American society we find "the public interest" a difficult concept to grapple with, because we are searching for universal criteria, answers to the question "Why?" which will satisfy everybody rather than answers which will satisfy each of us individually. But the cultural and religious pluralism and diffusion of power which are so characteristic of American society make it necessary to think of the public interest not as a code of ethics for the whole country, or even for an individual organization, but as a nontransferable way of thinking, developed by each individual for his own use.

To be sure, we get most of our "deep down" feelings about what is right and what is wrong in particular situations from the atmosphere around us—from family and church and school and the numerous organizations with which we associate ourselves. But that is not at all the same as saying that there are collective or organizational ethics that we can adopt as a substitute for thinking about moral complexity ourselves. . . . Sooner or later each individual must decide what to accept from the atmosphere he perceives around him.

For any individual in any situation, the public interest must ultimately be what he thinks it is. If this seems a peculiarly American answer to the question, "What is the public interest?" perhaps the answer demonstrates what free men we Americans really are.

For just as the essence of American democracy is that it is not anybody's business to say authoritatively what it is, so the essence of the public interest is that it cannot be authoritatively defined for any given individual in any given situation, except by that individual in that situation.

It is not to be expected that everybody will arrive at the same definition, especially on matters of importance. The disagreements we call politics; or if they are violent enough, we may even call them revolutions.

As in the evolution of law, precedents and precepts are some help. What was clearly the public interest in some historical situation, where we now know all the facts, may aid in solving tomorrow's similar questions for ourselves, even though most of the surrounding facts are yet unknown. Wise sayings, from Mencious and Aristotle, the Bible and the Founding Fathers (not to mention our own parents), may likewise be useful, but hardly controlling; with a little help from Bartlett's Familiar Quotations, it is all too easy to find some pseudo-scriptural basis for whatever one really wants to do.

Since the public interest in a free society is, paradoxically, so intimately personal a decision, I cannot suggest a series of universal ethical principles, written on stone tablets or mimeographed in an operations manual. I can only suggest, for purposes of illustration, the frame that I myself find useful in making moral and political judgments about public affairs from day to day. Ultimately I try to relate what goes on in the world, in the nation, in Syracuse, or in Washington, to the basic wants of modern man. In the oversimplified terms we often reserve for our most fundamental ideas, I see these basic wants as four:

First, modern man wants a sense of welfare—a minimum standard of "enough" in material living. How much is enough will of course vary from society to society and from decade to decade. But at any moment in any society there will exist, even if it cannot be precisely measured, a practical definition of the minimum safe guard which the society will collectively guarantee to its every individual member.

Second, people want a sense of equity—the feeling that they are being treated justly, not as measured by some ultimate standard, but as measured against the treatment accorded to other people (Please turn to page 49)

As reported in an earlier issue of the News Letter, Dr. C. Leonard Hoag has been in South Korea for the past academic year serving as a Fulbright Lecturer at the Law and Political College of Kyungbuk University at Taegu. Some of his observations of higher education there are revealed in this interesting report.

Higher Education in South Korea

by C. Leonard Hoag

Professor of Political Science

Kyungbuk university is located in Taegu, the third largest city of Korea (678,277). The city is in a kind of valley with rugged mountains all about, raw and ragged as the ravages of weather and man have denuded them of trees. In spite of its size, Taegu has the appearance of a small county seat with its myriads of stall-like open front stores, large open markets divided into food, clothing, kitchenware areas. One market, called the "Yankee" market, offered me an amusing experience. It was there I located my necessary cotton flannel pajamas and tried them on for size while dozens of admirers (?) served as an audience.

The end of Main Street runs into the RTO (Railway Station) and bus center where gay, multi-colored (red-white-blue-orange) buses start jampacked for the country-side. The USIS (United States Information Service) Center is nearby, conspicuous for its horrible, bilious green color but crowded displays. Sometimes one hopes that Washington will take some of the money spent in Seoul and provide ample facilities for the over-crowded, over-worked, and superlative staff at Taegu. The Director of USIS has been of major assistance to me, while the chief Korean administrator, a Mr. Lee, has served as guide, counsel, and friend with the utmost of courtesy and efficiency.

The University is located about one mile from my home and may be reached easily by nearby daily, free school bus, or hop-sung (jeep semi-taxi). The grounds are full of sculptured stone statuary (a part of the National Art Treasure) dating back to the famous Silla dynasty (670 BC), while the Law College has offices and classrooms lighted by nature and heated by sun. My first introduction to the gracious hospitality extended to this first Fulbright Lecturer in the "provinces" was my large office fully equipped with desk, four upholstered chairs, a small cot, and table with tea pot and four cups with an electric grill to heat the water. However, everyone prefers "my" coffee which I serve from my thermos between classes.

Besides formal classes of eight hours a week with about one hundred students and professors, my experiences have involved everything from a Fulbright orientation with the Minister of Education to afternoon visits from Middle School Children to my home for English "conversation." Two evenings a week are set aside for home sessions with my college students and a Faculty Seminar.

While serving on a panel in Seoul for selection of Korean Fulbrighters to our country, I met over forty college professors from over all of Korea. There I learned at first hand about the shortage of textbooks, tragic duplication of effort in the writing of English textbooks for literature and composition, the weakness of coordination in research and facilities among the National universities, and the fascinating experimentation in linguistics.

My visits to Seoul, made possible by the hospitable courtesy of the Embassy Cultural Affairs Officer, Mr. Arthur McTaggart, have enabled me to meet some of the leading journalists and educators in the capital, many of whom have studied in the United States.

Some time ago I participated in a University "workshop" discussion of higher education, where I was interested to hear (through an able, personal interpreter) how much concern there is here for the maintenance of "freedom" in education, more emphasis on moral guidance, and increased provision for better equipment in the science fields.

Higher Education is undergoing a painful and drastic reorganization that has ousted some personnel, retired others; consolidated some institutions and eliminated others, as an effort is made to cope more realistically with the expanding demands of the new nation.

Statistics are boring but indispensable at this point. Recently some 18,000 out of 25,000 college graduates from 48 institutions took the new national exams to secure their A.B. degree. Of these, 85% won their degree, which is a "must" for any government employment. The remainder secure a diploma for their four year effort and join the ranks of some 300,000 secondary school children who also, either failing to pass the middle school exams or lacking finances to complete their education, swell the ranks of the unemployed.

Sixty percent of these college graduates are in the Dean McLeod of Northwestern University was recently elected President of the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators.

Although Middlebury has so far placed only nine men in this rather hectic profession, its representatives have made a substantial contribution to the field of student personnel administration. Six have been active in state and regional student personnel professional associations. Deans Craig and Hoffmann have published numerous articles and books. Jim McLeod has recently been elected to the Presidency of the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators; Bill Craig has just completed a term as President of the American College Personnel Association, and Joe House is currently the Vice President of the Evening College Personnel Association. Harvey Martin was Treasurer of the APGA 1961 National Convention.

A few years ago, the office of Dean of Students or Dean of Men was considered either as a stepping stone to a higher university or college office or was often categorized as a necessary but unenviable job to be foisted upon some member of the faculty who either possessed the ability to get along with students or who had reached a professional dead end. Since World War II, the deanship has emerged as a profession entitled to recognition as an important part of the college organization. The business of "looking after the students" requires a penetrating insight into all phases of the college or university and, like the governmental bureaucracy, expands as it makes itself indispensable. Jim McLeod, for example, has a staff of 120 persons directly responsible to his office. Bill Craig has 91. The rest of us have staffs ranging from 20 to 50.

When the college President has to assign a new administrative responsibility, he will often give it to the Dean with the remark, "It seems to have something to do with students, so you do it." The result, as Dean Hoffmann explains, has been that, "My job seems to cut across almost every field and problem in higher education, and I deal constantly with individual students with all my efforts directed toward facilitating the educational process."

The job description of the office according to the Statutes of Northwestern University is typical: "The Dean of Students is responsible for all student life outside of the classroom." Any alumn will vouch for the fact that a lot of student life takes place outside of the classroom. Essentially, the modern dean has to maintain a balance between students, faculty, administration, and often the surrounding community—no easy task. To accomplish this feat of precarious balance requires a sense of humor, the ability of a diplomat, the broad shoulders of an ox, and the patience of Job. What do you say to the local police when you locate dozens of detour signs, stop signs, and lanterns after a suggested search of the dorms and fraternity houses? How often have we heard the townspeople groan out, "And (Please turn to page 49)

JOHN T. ANDREWS

JOHN T. ANDREWS, Professor of Philosophy, came to Middlebury in 1936 to teach philosophy while Professor Vernon C. ("Gramp") Harrington was on a sabbatical leave. Because of failing health Professor Harrington did not return to full time teaching and Professor Andrews remained at the College. He has been chairman of the Department of Philosophy since 1947.

Drawing from a background of long professional experience, his classroom delivery is polished and articulate. Students also appreciate his informal ease, warm personality, and the patent genuineness of his interest in the progress of their studies.

After more than twenty-five years of teaching at Middlebury, having encountered many students of all kinds, Professor Andrews is convinced that philosophy must remain as one of the central disciplines of the liberal arts curriculum. "If there is any simple text for the study of philosophy," he said, "it would be the immortal statement of Socrates in the Apology, that 'the unexamined life is not worth living.' Liberal Arts which some people believe prepares them for little but discontent and frustration. With unemployment at about 2½ million, an estimated 200,000 jobless college graduates alone, an ever increasing surplus of teachers and lawyers, one can understand but not totally sympathize with the new emphasis on technical and vocational education.

The new slogan: "One man—One skill" indicates the vocational emphasis but the big questions remain as to what skills, who is to teach them, how they are to be taught, and the degree to which qualified educational personnel will be brought into the planning.

While competing against odds of 100 to 1 for jobs, those who find employment will secure average salaries ranging from $30 to $50 monthly in the field of government or education. The college population of 150,000 is to be pared to 50,000 with priority in selection being given to natural science and vocational candidates (agriculture, fisheries, transportation and communication, mechanics, commerce, and public health).

In spite of the high costs of education to a largely rural population, the prestige and status connected with a degree causes parents and students to make inordinate sacrifices.

Eager students attend college classes in day-time and study at English Language "Institutes" at night to increase their capacity for survival in the heartbreaking competitive struggle for job and security.

In all of this, there is a love of color, a fondness for music, and ever-present "earthy" humor which makes these people the "Irish" of the Orient, and deserving of the greater advancement which must come.

Ringnes and Amund Ringnes Islands it was claimed by Sverdrup for Norway by right of discovery, but the claim was never contested. After considerable and long-delayed negotiation, the Sverdrup Islands officially passed under Canadian sovereignty in 1930. In many instances, however, the original Norwegian place-names have been retained, and their crispness and vitality seem appropriate in the stark setting.

IN THE YEARS following its discovery Axel Heiberg was visited briefly by a number of field parties, but scientific work was limited to reconnaissance journeys that, for the most part, undertook biological and geological collections along the east and south coasts. The work of Sverdrup's expedition, in particular the topographic surveys of the coastal areas, remained the major scientific accomplishment in the area until the establishment of the jointly operated Canadian-U. S. weather stations of Eureka on Ellesmere Island in 1947 and Isachsen on Ellef Ringnes Island in 1948 and the inauguration of an extensive series of ground and aerial surveys of the Queen Elizabeth Islands by the Canadian Geological Survey and the Royal Canadian Air Force during this period.

Complementary to the work currently being done on Axel Heiberg Island are the activities of two Canadian Government expeditions: the Polar Continental Shelf Project, undertaking geological and geophysical exploration of the shelf and islands bordering the Arctic Ocean, and "Operation Hazen" which, although originally a Canadian contribution to the IGY, has subsequently continued glaciological, meteorological, and general geophysical investigations in northern Ellesmere Island. In addition American field parties have conducted scientific studies during recent years on the Ellesmere Ice Shelf, an area of land-fast ice north of Ellesmere Island that is believed to be the birthplace of many of the ice-islands that slowly circulate around the Arctic Ocean. Both American and Russian scientists have used these islands as floating observation stations during the past several years.

Considerable attention has been given by McGill to the place which an arctic expedition can have within the organization of a university. Senior scientists in the geography, geology, physics and meteorology departments of the University have acted as advisors for the individual programs and several have been in the field for short periods. Co-ordinated by Dr. Müller, much of the planning and execution of the programs have been carried out by graduate students from the University, or in a few cases from abroad. In the field these men have been assisted in their observations by undergraduates. Thus representatives of the main segments of the university population have been brought together to work on problems of mutual interest.

White Glacier and Thompson Glacier meet in the Jacobsen-McGill Arctic Research Expedition's area of scientific investigations this summer on Axel Heiberg Island, N.W.T., Canada. With an Academic Expedition to the High Arctic

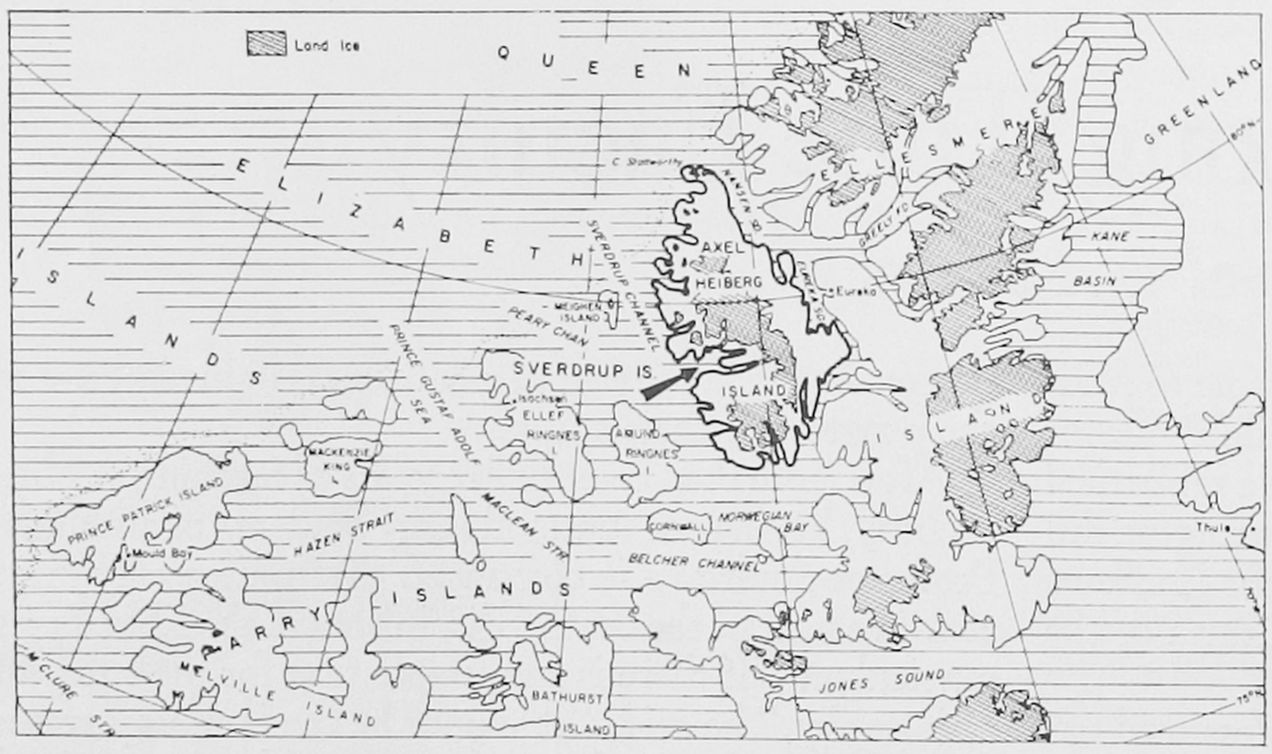
By James M. Havens '53

Canada's increased interest in the economic potential of her far northern arctic islands and the participation of the country in the recent International Geophysical Year (IGY) have given stimulus to the systematic exploration of the Canadian North. An important current effort in this direction is being made by the Jacobsen-McGill Arctic Research Expedition. Sponsored by McGill University, the Expedition has spent each summer since 1959 on Axel Heiberg Island, 80° north latitude, about 700 miles from the Pole. It is there now in the summer of 1962.

The immediate aim of the Expedition, which has received funds from the Canadian Government, as well as financial support from commercial organizations and private patrons, is the investigation of the island's natural environment. Its purpose therefore differs from that of field prospectors who are seeking areas for possible future mineral and petroleum exploitation. Of these latter expeditions field parties working in the possibly oil-rich western Queen Elizabeth Islands have recently received considerable publicity.

Following a brief reconnaissance during the summer of 1959 the Expedition, under the leadership of the Swiss glaciologist Dr. Fritz Müller, had large parties —each numbering more than twenty scientists—in the field during the summers of 1960 and 1961. Glaciology, which depends to a great extent upon the contributions of a number of disciplines, has acted as an integrator, synthesizing individual investigations in topographic survey, geology, geophysics, and meteorology. Field observations in botany and zoology have also been undertaken.



Arrow points to the location of the author and the Jacobsen-McGill Arctic Research Expedition this summer on Axel Heiberg Island.

Axel Heiberg Island, approximately the size of Southern New England, is the largest island of those discovered by the Second Fram Expedition, 1898–1902, led by the Norwegian sea captain Otto Sverdrup. Together with Ellef

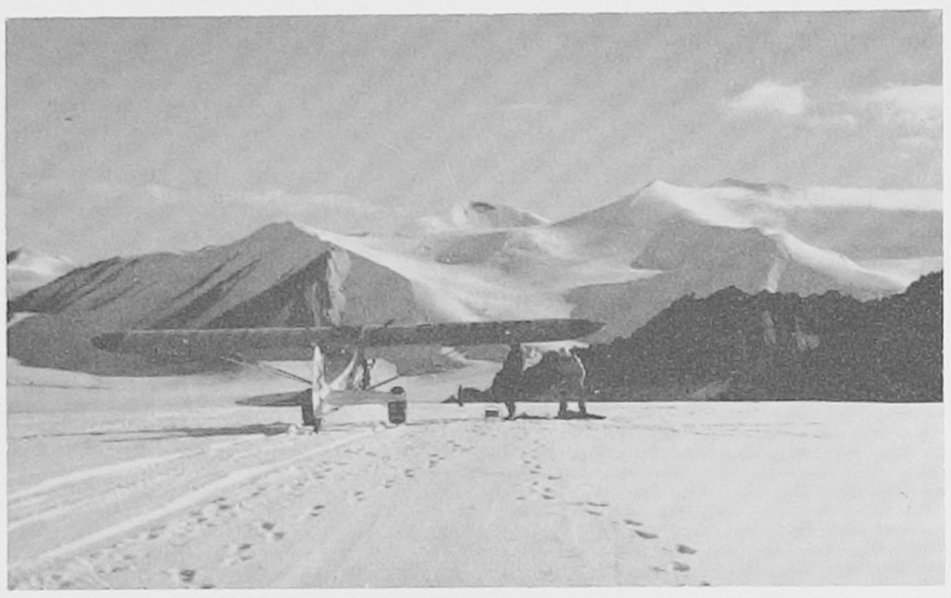
A motor toboggan pulling a heavily loaded Nansen sledge assists in the transportation of equipment and supplies over ice-covered ground. In particularly rough areas and over bare ground, however, considerable backpacking by personnel is necessary.



Light-weight airplanes, on large, low-pressure tires or skis, are hired by the Expedition to lay caches and transport personnel to areas remote from the base camp. The versatility of Piper Super-Cub and Beaver aircraft in particular has been repeatedly demonstrated. Their use has revolutionized the exploration of the Canadian Arctic.

The accompanying photographs give some indication of the alpine nature of much of Axel Heiberg Island, about a third of which is permanently covered by snowfields and glaciers. Field work under such conditions would be extremely difficult, indeed hazardous, without the aid of experienced mountaineers. For this purpose several men with alpine experience have been recruited from Switzerland, and they have, in addition, frequently contributed directly to the scientific programs.

The international complexion of the Expedition, the result of attempting to find the best qualified person for the job to be done, has itself lent a stimulus that would not be found in a purely national venture. Scientists from Austria, the Netherlands, Norway, South Africa, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and West Germany as well as Canada, Switzerland, and the United States have taken part. One can say, in this respect, that the Expedition has helped carry out at the working level the organizational goals of the IGY. Its academic outlook, quite new to North America, is in many ways similar to summer arctic expeditions that have been undertaken by British universities and schools since the 1920's.

Following a two-month summer season this year, designed primarily to continue the glaciological and meteorological observations, the current series of detailed investigations will be brought to a close, to permit the working up of the large amount of data that has been collected. It is anticipated, however, that routine observations, to provide continuity and to aid in the further training of personnel, will be continued in the future. At the present time results can only be considered preliminary; however, some of them might be of general interest to News Letter readers.

The amount of snow and ice accumulated on a glacier during a particular year, less the amount lost, mainly by melting, determines the glacier's mass budget, somewhat analogous to a financial credit/debit balance. It has been found that large fluctuations in this annual budget exist from year to year on Axel Heiberg Island. In 1959–60 the budget for White Glacier, a typical valley-type glacier, was strongly negative, but in the following year it was slightly positive. Persistence of a negative budget over many years will lead to a retreat of a glacier's snout. At a time when most of the glaciers of the Northern Hemisphere are in retreat, it is particularly interesting that two of the four glaciers of western Axel Heiberg Island which are being investigated in detail show measured advance, one of them as much as sixty feet during 1960–61.

It is obvious that fluctuations in the glacier's mass budget reflect fluctuations in the contemporary meteorological elements—mainly snowfall and summer heat, the latter in the form of solar radiation and sensible and latent heat from the air over the glacier. Determination of these factors, either by measurement or calculation, is the main task of the Expedition's meteorologists.

Popular imagination assigns severe conditions to arctic ice caps even during the summer, but the weather station located over a mile above sea-level on the island's main ice cap did not confirm this in 1960. Temperatures during the author's stay there, from late May to late August, generally ranged between 20° and 30° F.; the summer was, however, unusually warm. Fog, often depositing ice was present about a third of the time, and drifting snow was not uncommon. However, brilliant days with up to twenty-four hours of bright sunshine provided delightful contrast. Short periods of melting occurred from time to time, and this feature of the summer weather has subsequently been found to occur up to elevations of at least 6800 feet, near the island's highest peak. THE EGBERT STARR LIBRARY

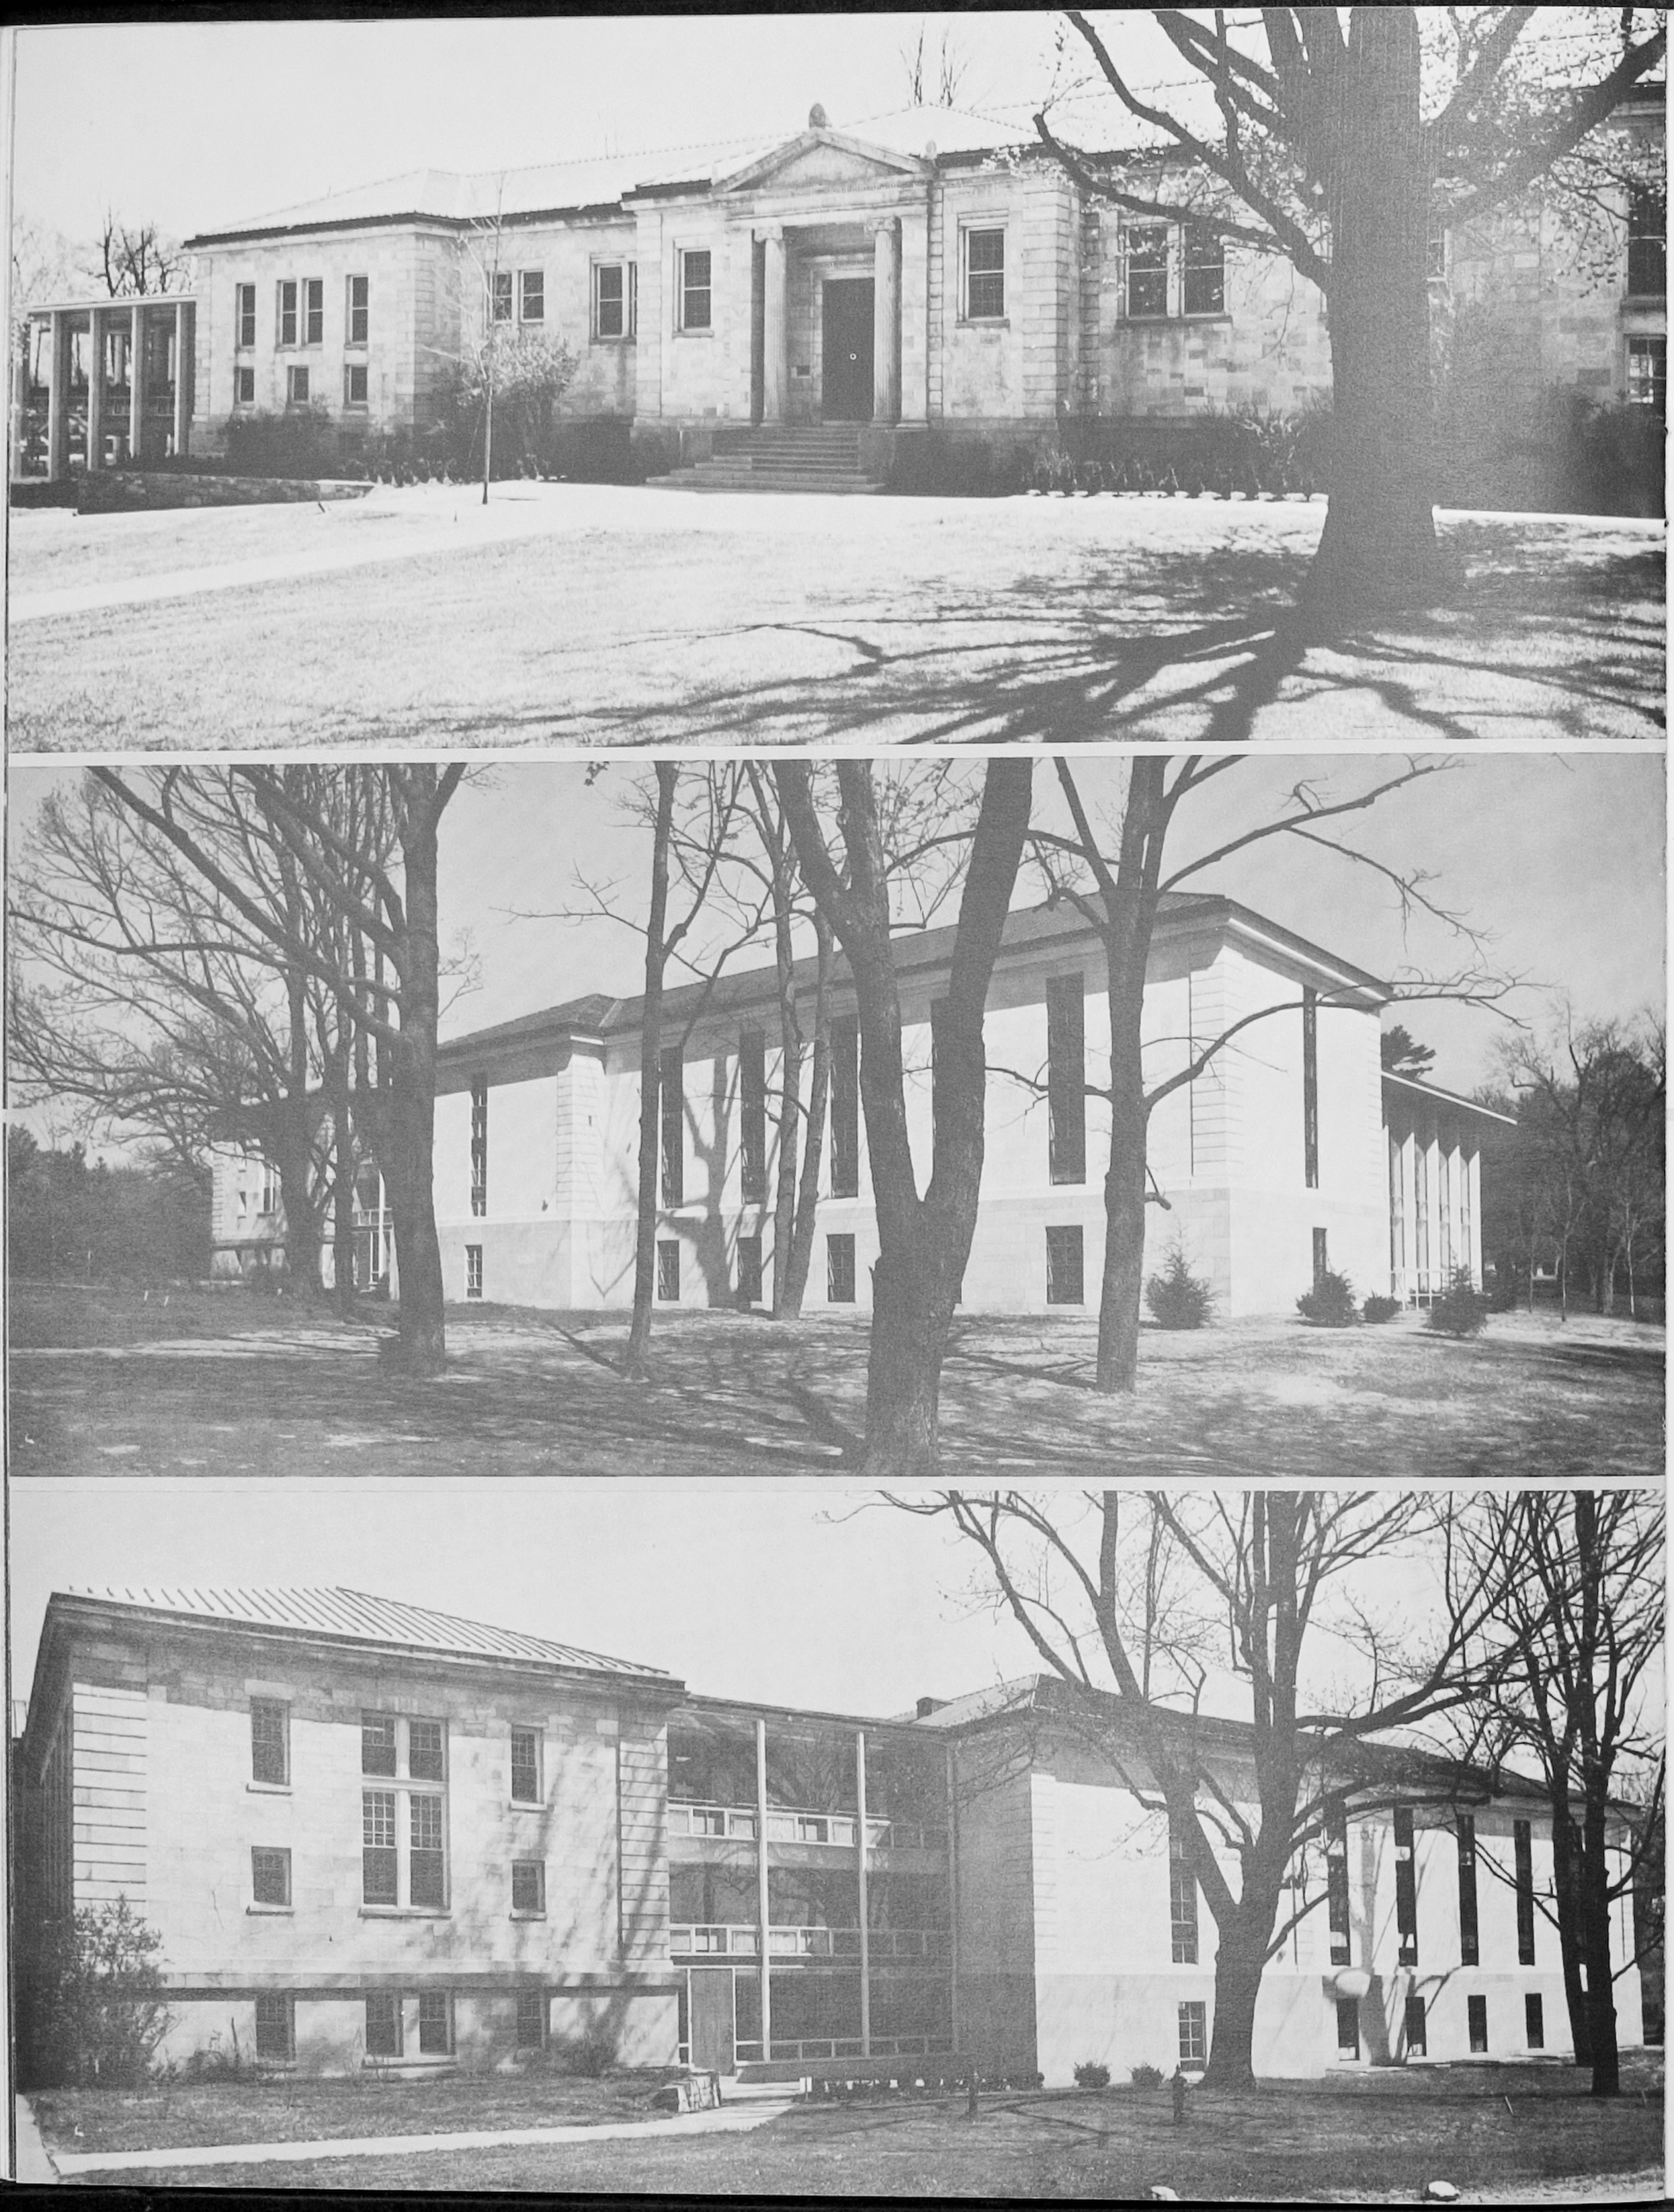
THE three-million-dollar Egbert Starr Library was started in 1900 when the central portion was dedicated. In 1928 two wings were added, and in 1962 a $1,350,000 expansion and renovation program was completed, giving Middlebury an outstanding library that now takes its proper place as the heart of this liberal arts college.

The academic influence of the Egbert Starr Library is old in tradition and provides the climate in which a true liberal arts program can flourish. The physical nature of the building encourages the type of library program considered by the College to be most helpful to students. Open stacks allow free access to most of the Library's many thousands of volumes. Conveniently located tables, chairs and carrels in all parts of the building invite students to work in close proximity to the shelves of books they will be using. There are a number of rooms which extend the services of the library and make it more vital to the educational program. Seminar rooms, faculty studies, student typing booths, and a microfilm room are among the several purposeful areas established for student and faculty use.

On or near the main floor of the Library are the Robert Frost Room, Abernethy Library, Special Collections Room, card catalogue, Library offices, work rooms, and the circulation desk where books are checked in and out. Here, too, are the reference shelves, periodicals, reserve books, shelves of new books, and browsing areas and lounges for student convenience.

The second floor includes, in addition to stacks, typing booths, studies and reading area, as well as the Flanders Ballad Collection with an office for the



with the Middlebury ALUMNAE CLUBS

Manhattan Alumnae contributed generously to the National Project by giving $450 to the Faculty Study. Part of this sum was raised by holding a Fashion Show under the direction of Martha Conklin Kays, '45. Pictured, left to right, are; Miss Marilyn R. Bruhn, '47; Mrs. Shirley Miller Stearns, '45; a professional model; Mrs. Mary Henseler Cassidy, '31 and Miss Josephine Vogel, '61. Mrs. Stearns continues as president of the group.

Welcome to the 1962 Women graduates:

On such a magical day in June as this there can be no more pleasant duty than welcoming you, the women of the Class of 1962, as new Alumnae.

As undergraduates you have probably been almost unaware of the activities of alumnae, but when you receive your degrees, you will become eligible for membership in the Alumnae Association of Middlebury College. You will discover that being an alumna of the College will tie you forever to the College. It will depend on you how closely that will be maintained.

This June, we alumnae are celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of the formation of our Alumnae Association. Through the years it has been by the work, loyalty, devotion and interest of the alumnae that the Association has grown to its present stature. We look to you and to succeeding classes after you to continue this tradition of contributing to the growth of the College through your Association. In commemoration of the Fiftieth Anniversary, the Association has given to the College a Faculty Study which you have seen in your Library. This is just one example of the work of alumnae—work in which we look forward to your participation.

Now, as you are about to leave the College on the Hill, I know success in your chosen fields of endeavor will come to each of you. Please take the best wishes of all of us "old" alumnae with you. We are delighted you are joining us and anticipate with pleasure our future mutual association together.

Miss Marilyn R. Bruhn, '47
President, Alumnae Association

The alumnae association wishes to take this opportunity to sincerely thank the twelve Alumnae Clubs for their fine work which has made possible the Association's 50th Anniversary commemorative gift of a Faculty Study in the Library a reality. The clubs worked in many ways in their respective communities to raise money for this purpose as well as to provide scholarship aid for Middlebury women.

The Boston Middlebury Alumnae Association held a series of regional meetings this year as a money raising project enabling them to contribute two Loyalty Shares to the Faculty Study. Also, in the Spring, Suzanne Simmons Daily, '54, headed the Thrift Shop Sale to raise money for the group's Scholarship Fund. In the coming year, Mary Nelson Loud, '41, will continue to lead the group.

After contributing a Loyalty Share in the Faculty Study last year, the Burlington (Vt.) Alumnae Club voted this year at its annual meeting in the home of Norma Winberg Unsworth, '41, to contribute $50 to the Dean's Discretionary Fund. Guests of the group at this meeting were Miss Barbara Wells, '41, Director of Admissions for Women, Miss Constance Sherman, '53, Alumnae Secretary and Dean Elizabeth B. Kelly. Nancy Gurney Hayes, '58, was elected to head the group.

Cleveland Alumnae have contributed through their club a total of $950 to the Faculty Study by holding three successful Candle Sales during the past three years. Mrs. Jean Hosford Fleming, '52 has led the group this past year.

The traditional May Breakfast of the Hartford Alumnae Club was held in the (Please turn to page 55)

Director, and listening booths; the Saudi Arabian Seminar Room, the Edwin S. S. Sunderland Room for special library events and audio-visual use.

On the ground floor are faculty studies, typing booths, the John Fletcher Seminar Room and a spacious reading room. In the lower floor is the André Morize Seminar Room, foreign language collections and study.

Historians point out the development of the library on the Middlebury campus, how it grew from a modest few shelves in the early 1800s on the second floor of Old Chapel to its hundreds of shelves in today's Egbert Starr Library. With this development has also come the need for an expanded staff to care for the properties of the library and to serve the students who use them.

The Egbert Starr Library staff is headed by professional people who are not only keepers of books, but educators and counselors of students. Supporting the administrative staff are capable, well trained individuals who maintain the books and the circulation program.

Students at Middlebury College will find the personal touch much in evidence at the Egbert Starr Library. As a result of library staff efforts they will find books in good supply, in good repair, and in proper location. They will also find the library staff always ready to help in locating new materials appropriate to study needs and in maintaining an atmosphere which will make library time both pleasant and profitable.

How was it possible?

The recently completed expansion and renovation of the Egbert Starr Library was a part of Middlebury College's Development Program. This program has as its basic objective to attract the necessary additional financial resources to provide for the College an adequate staff of high quality, better faculty salaries and the physical facilities and equipment needed to maintain Middlebury's high educational standards.

A total of 3,240 gifts and grants from generous individuals, foundations and corporations made possible the success of Middlebury's $1,350,000 library program of expansion and renovation. Listed among these gifts were contributions from Alumni-ae—through the Combined Library and Alumni Fund—parents, friends of the College, members of the College family, as well as a number of foundations and corporations.

The following table is an analysis of the broad range of giving that made the latest Library Project a success.

William F. Trask, '52, Director of Placement at Worcester (Mass.) Polytechnic Institute, was honored recently by having the Institute's yearbook The Peddler dedicated in his honor. He was also initiated into "Skull," men's honor society.

The Peddler dedication stated:

Although he has been here only since 1958, Bill Trask has made an impression on the student body enjoyed by few members of the administration or faculty. As Director of Placement, Bill is probably better known to the seniors than to the underclassmen, but any student who becomes acquainted with our energetic 'job hunter' comes away with the feeling that 'here is a really nice guy.'

After receiving his A.B. from Middlebury College in 1952, Bill served in the Marine Corps for two years. He then returned to Middlebury as Assistant Dean of Men for one year. Just before coming to Tech he worked as Advertising Manager for the Addison County Independent, a local Middlebury newspaper.

When the Placement Office was expanded in 1958, Dean Downing took on the full-time duties of Dean of Admissions and Bill was brought in as Placement Director. Since then his managerial ability, attention to details and, above all, his desire to help the student, have made the work of his office more and more effective each year.

Bill's smile, his constant activity, his eagerness to help any student who asks assistance, and his sincere desire to make his department as effective as possible have made a lasting impression on those who know him. The success of his efforts is clearly shown each year by the large percentage of seniors who obtain challenging, productive work.

We of The Peddler staff feel proud and grateful that a man of Bill's calibre has decided to devote his talents to Worcester Tech. We feel doubly honored that we are able to dedicate the 1962 Peddler to Mr. William Foley Trask.

Children of Louis Francisco, '52, are seen by their mother in a TV "special" in her room at the Good Samaritan Hospital, West Islip, L.I., New York. Performers are her children, Debbie, 8, Linda, 5, and Michael, 7. The show was piped from her home in Oak Beach, five miles distance, to her hospital bedside by her husband, an executive of Micro-Link Corp., a firm that makes TV equipment.

Mr. Francisco received permission from the hospital to install the television system which proved very successful in keeping children (and father) in touch with mother in the hospital.

Hospital spokesman described the system as a microwave one-way relay system and said it was the first time it had been used at the institution. Both the transmitter at the home and the receiver at the hospital were self-contained portable units, each weighing under 32 pounds. The system eliminated the need for an expensive co-axial cable.

The Federal Communications Commission assigned the call letters KFZXEZ (Channel 6) to the hospital for Mr. Francisco's TV system and possible future use.

P.S. Mr. Francisco reports that his wife is now home "fit as a fiddle."

in comparable situations. (This does not, of course, mean all others, even in your own society. Nobody in England seems to begrudge the provision in the national budget of a royal income for the Royal Family.)

Third, there seems to be a universal desire these days for a sense of achievement—man's feeling that he is getting somewhere, that the group of which he is a part is making progress in some generally accepted direction. For people in organized society, high morale depends not so much on what goals men choose as on their shared feeling of movement toward them.

Finally, modern man wants a sense of participation in deciding what those goals will be. He needs to feel that he has some control over his own destiny through taking part in a group or groups which can and do in fact influence the basic decisions on which his welfare, equity, and achievement depend—decisions about the state of the economy, the security of the person, the freedom of mind, and ultimately decisions about life and death, peace and war.

Three short comments on these "basic wants." First of all, they are not of course, statistically measurable, or empirically verifiable in general: they are all "feelings" or "senses" based on vague judgments about the relationship of the individual to the society in which he finds himself. Even for a small group at a defined time in a particular place, the judgments about adequacy, equity, achievement, and participation must be rough approximations, not "facts" that can in some sense be proved.

Moreover, this statement of the basic wants of modern man depends for its validity on an awareness by the individual of his relationship with society. They imply he cares about this relationship; that his attitude is of one seeking to influence his destiny, not passively accepting what fate or the gods or his own family have provided in the way of environment. It hardly needs to be observed that this is a new state of mind for most of mankind, dating in the West from the Renaissance and the Reformation, spreading to the East through the colonial governors, district officers, navies, armies, missionaries, traders, and reformist politicians, all of whom stirred up ancient societies by providing new wants to want, and therefore, new enthusiasm for change.

Finally, these basic wants are appropriate to an era in which, as one philosopher has wryly put it, "we don't know where we're going, but we know we're going there fast." Rapid change is the dominant fact of our time, and presents problems which people in more static societies did not have to face. We know that an ever-higher standard of welfare is technically possible now—that greater equity can be achieved in a situation of growth. The very urge for a sense of achievement is evidence that change is the expected norm; both our aspirations and our actions are geared to it. The growing desire to participate in decisions affecting our own destiny stems from the conviction that things are certain to change, and that events must, therefore, be influenced in directions that are congenial to us.

to think that the future of our country rests in the hands of such as these!"

BILL CRAIG has often remarked that his Middlebury background had much to do with his decision to move into the professon. Four of the seven were members of Blue Key, all played varsity athletics, all were fraternity men, and for what it is worth, none were particularly outstanding scholars. Randy Hoffman explains our position more clearly: "The constructive relationships that I had with some faculty and administration certainly served as examples of the kind of experience that helps to develop and educate the individual. This is the kind of relationship I keep trying to establish between myself and my students." In many respects, working closely with young people keeps you young. Bill Craig relates the time when he was attempting (unsuccessfully) to halt "a panty raid." The crowd of unruly students had forced him against the outside wall of a coed's dorm and seeking an escape he decided to crawl through an open window. As he stuck his head in, the housemother spotted him and admonished his action by shouting, "Go home young man and act your age!"

In addition to numerous meetings with student organizations and administrative committees, most deans hold from eight to ten conferences per day with individual students and/or parents. Contrary to general belief, discipline, which we enjoy the least, is not the primary reason for a conference. Financial assistance, jobs, personal matters, and academic counseling demand much more attention than pranks, panty raids, and general disturbance. As a matter of fact, the need for student housing, financial assistance programs, and jobs has extended the office from such matters as the academic, counseling, discipline, and student activities into hotel management, banking, and industrial relations.

Although Harvey Martin insists that he was conned into his present position by an exuberant college president, the rest of us moved into the profession with our eyes open. There is no substitute for experience when considering preparation for such a broad and demanding position which requires a rather complete working knowledge of the college organization and the ability to administrate. All seven have been commissioned officers in various branches of the military, which has been helpful. All have held professorships at one time or another. Jim McLeod is a professor of religion, Bill Craig a professor of education, Randy Hoffman an English professor, Joe House of political science, Harvey Martin and Milt Pike are psychologists. Deans Craig and Hoffman moved into administration as assistant directors of admission at Middlebury, Jim McLeod from the office of University Chaplin, and Joe House from Dean of Men at a liberal arts college. Harvey Martin was the director of the University of Denver Counseling Center, and Milt Pike started as a counselor. Without a thorough background, seasoned by long experience, the complexities of the college community would be extremely confusing. Nevertheless, when working with young people, each day introduces something new and something different, making it practically impossible to fall into the proverbial "rut."

Higher education in the United States has been experiencing a continual state of transition since World War II. Perhaps even more important than the obvious increases in plant, costs, size of student body and faculty are the changes in curriculum, altering student attitudes and concepts, and the internal administrative adjustments necessary to cope with the metamorphosis from the college of the past to the institution of the future. To quote from Storrs Lee's "God Bless Our Queer Old Dean" once again:

"In the college that manages to remain small and independent there will be room for the deanly scholar, but the booming university will have to reserve the big chair for the organization man, the impersonal personnel specialist whose first responsibility is managing the masses instead of the individual. The very nature of a cumbersome student body and the unwieldy university colossus makes his professional services essential."

According to the vocational files of the Middlebury College Placement Office, the Alumni listed in the article "Seven Old Deans" are presently engaged in "deanship work."

of any sort. It is, however, constantly watered, increased and renewed, by the addition of educated people in the country from all the various walks of life. Education, he pointed out, in a democratic nation such as ours, is one of our most vital concerns and if this education is to serve its purpose, it must be education in the broadest sense. It must be education in the sense of a constant quest for the unknown rather than the limited, specific, useful type of knowledge, which is provided by a vocational institution.

In summary, Dean Reynolds quoted a speech made by Edward R. Murrow, to a group of college presidents at the American Council of Education, in which Mr. Murrow had quoted a former Mexican foreign minister as having said: "The United States has done many fine things for Mexico. You have spent fifty million helping us eradicate hoof and mouth disease. You have constructed sewage systems in each of our towns along the border. You have helped us build health clinics and other public works throughout the country. But the finest single thing you have ever done for us, in my opinion, was to establish the Benjamin Franklin Library". "There is no doubt," continued Dean Reynolds, "but that there is a strong parallel between a fine library and a liberal arts education. Both the library and the liberal arts education are open-ended. They provide the means for the constant quest for the unknown. It is the process through which man may constantly strive for truth with the knowledge that, while absolute truth will never be achieved except through faith, the process of looking for truth and finding the truth, which corresponds to the needs of our times, is the task of the uncommon creative individual. If we are to survive we must depend on the superior education of such people."

PROFESSOR PARDON E. TILLINGHAST commented on the need of an inquiry to find out whether the kind of education now being given is what American Society needs. He noted that when parents begin searching for a college for their children they do not always look into the question of "how the college goes about motivating late teen-agers; or what the relationship is between the college's purported goals as stated in the catalogue and the actual practice on the campus; or the relation of either to their children's particular needs and the needs of the American society in the later 20th century. Few post-adolescents," he continued, "go to colleges to learn to become scholars; much less to become dutiful alumni. They go because it is what one does now . . ."

Dr. Tillinghast suggested that alumni might try to make their communities aware of what is going on in colleges; of the pressure inside and outside the academic profession; and of the fact that students in college will change there in just about direct proportion to the effort they wish to put into changing themselves. "Alumni constitute not only an important, but a vital group of informed people," he asserted, "and they can do more than they realize to make or break education in the next 25 years."

MRS. ELIZABETH B. KELLY, Dean of Women, declared that a liberal arts college has a great responsibility for developing the whole individual—social as well as academic. "If the social climate is not a healthy one," she said, "then the academic success of the individual is doubtful. Just how to direct the social activities of college students is a delicate problem in guidance. They cannot be legislated into social affairs which are approved by authorities. The results of force in this area are disastrous. Students are not always happy with their own efforts, but they are resistant to change.

"It is my opinion," said Dean Kelly, "that it is our responsibility to teach some of the social amenities, or at least remind students of them. Somehow, community living is a destructive force in the areas of responsibility and courtesy, and it is our task to counteract this by careful guidance—not an easy matter."

Painter Hall, built in 1815, is the oldest college building in Vermont.

book based on Dr. Neuse's discovery of construction in German differing in consistent patterns from the English.

Dr. Henry B. Prickitt (English) has been appointed Vermont State Chairman of the annual awards program conducted by the National Council of Teachers of English.

Rev. Edwin S. Redkey (Religion) has completed his year as Acting Chaplain during Chaplain Scott's absence and has joined the Operation-Crossroads Africa Organization as a leader in their summer project. This is a serious effort to relate a carefully selected group of American students to Africans on the African continent. Each leader will have students of different racial, religious and cultural backgrounds under his supervision. The students have been selected for their quest of adventure, have a high academic standing and have been judged to possess leadership potential.

Dr. Vincent H. Malmstrom (Geography) is spending two months of the summer on selected areas of Norway's 1200 fjord coast under a grant from the U. S. Office of Naval Research. He plans to test further a new hypothesis he developed in Iceland about the "strandflat." This coastal landform has been the object of speculation and study for more than half a century. Mr. Malmstrom becomes Associate Professor of Geography in the new College year.

Dr. Klaus H. Wolff (Economics) will attend the second international meeting of the Economic History Association at Aix-en-Provence in Southern France late in August.

come to college," he continued, "with widely differing backgrounds, attitudes and interests. It is not the business of philosophy to impart beliefs or commitments. Rather its business is to lead the student to clarify his ideas, to think more logically, to examine critically his fundamental beliefs and to broaden his vision. In an age of increasing complexity, technological specialization and deeply rooted conflicts in values, this task ever gains in importance for education."

Born in Holyoke, Mass., John Andrews received his A.B. from Amherst and did his graduate work at Harvard. He taught at Beloit College in Wisconsin prior to joining the Middlebury faculty. Professor Andrews is married to the former Elizabeth B. Parker, '30. The Andrews have three children.

WITH AN ACADEMIC EXPEDITION TO THE HIGH ARCTIC

In the valleys of the fiorded west coast, summer temperatures can attain relatively high levels, particularly in sheltered depressions such as the one occupied by the Expeditions' base camp, where an absolute maximum of 66° F. was experienced in 1960 and 61° F. during the following year's somewhat cooler summer. Thawed soil, underlain by permanently frozen ground, occurs in many of these valley locations and where combined with a favorable microclimate supports considerable vegetation. Botanical collections have doubled the number of vascular plants previously known to exist on the island, and the number of lichen species found has been increased from seven to about 250.

At one site a core of peaty material was extracted and later subjected to pollen analysis. The evidence indicates that plants similar to those now prevalent were present during the past several thousand years. This work has identified minute amounts of pollen from pine and alder, which is attributed to a wind-blown origin. Present-day source areas for this pollen lie over a thousand miles to the southwest. Sections of tree trunks in fossilized condition have also been found in the area. A suggestion has been made that they might have grown in situ some one hundred million years ago. The hypothesis that they are Cretaceous drift-wood, brought from perhaps a considerable distance and raised to their present elevated sites by a rise of the land relative to the sea, has also been put forward.

As the vegetation cover of western Axel Heiberg Island was found to be richer than expected, it is not surprising that more animals inhabit the area than had previously been thought. The vegetarians: musk-ox, caribou, arctic hare, and lemming, as well as the predators: arctic fox, wolf, ermine, and snowy owl have been seen by field parties. Ringed seal can be found in the fiords. Birds sighted in the area include ptarmigan, snow bunting, long-tailed jaeger, arctic tern, turnstone, eider duck, snow goose, and various sea-gulls.

The scientific work thus far accomplished on Axel Heiberg Island has established a foundation for more detailed and varied studies by future generations of students and graduates, with the continuity of the investigations maintained by scientists on the University's faculty. The area is an unusual field laboratory of great beauty in which a student can complement his classroom work by practical experience. In addition the Expedition provides him with the advantage of working in a milieu of international scientific co-operation and fellowship.

home of Gertrude Parsons Crehan, '28, on May 20. Miss Constance Sherman, who was guest speaker, thanked the group for their contribution of a Loyalty Share in the Faculty Study made possible by their sponsoring a community lecture by Dr. Mischa H. Fayer in November.

Long Island Alumnae also contributed a Loyalty Share in the Study to commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the National Association.

The New Jersey Alumnae Clubs lead the list of contributors to the Faculty Study project with their gift of $1,398.75. This amount was raised largely through a series of successful Fashion Shows. In the coming year, the New Jersey Alumnae Council will be headed by Barbara Roemer Ready, '48. Presidents of the Northern New Jersey and Midd-Jersey groups will be Dorothy Cornwall Cheney, '33 and Emily Barclay Jackson, '38.

Pioneer Valley (Mass.) Alumnae established a scholarship this year for a Middlebury undergraduate woman from the Western Massachusetts area. The group met in May at the homer Wagner, Browning Hunter, '23, and re-elected Janet Schonga of Barbara '53, as president.

Philadelphia Alumnae are most appreciative of one of their member's work which has helped them to contribute $270 to the Faculty Study. Juliet Carrington Reed, '48, a Geology major at Middlebury, makes jewelry from unusual polished stones and donates her profit from this venture to Middlebury through the local Club. Heading this group next year will be Nancy Wright Reuther, '54.

The Twin State (Vt.-N. H.) Alumnae Club contributed to the Faculty Study their profits from a White Elephant Sale. At a meeting in April, Jean Davis Battey, '47, was elected President.

Westchester (N. Y.) Alumnae contributed $325 to the Faculty Study by sponsoring two successful Mid-Winter gatherings of Alumni and Alumnae in the Pelham Country Club. Mrs. Patricia Cavanaugh Boss, '53, is president of the group.

Worcester County (Mass.) Alumnae gave a Loyalty Share contribution to the Faculty Study from profits made in the sale of candy. In addition, this Spring the group contributed an additional $50 to help to furnish the Study. At the annual meeting in April, Miss Marilyn R. Bruhn, '47, National Association president, was guest speaker. Jean Holmberg Sutherland, '49, will continue as president in the coming year.
